RICHARD MAITLAND

"I still have the creative spirit," said artist Richard Maitland when asked what he's up to these days. New work and older paintings and mixed media collages will be shown when a retrospective of his work opens downtown at Gallerie Imaginarium this month (gallerieimagination.com). "There are pieces in the show I did when I was 9 years old," he said. Nowadays (Maitland is 86) his art reflects a satirical sensibility about politics, religion and bigotry – but without being insulting, Maitland points out. "I'm a humanist; I want everybody to love one another." You'll love his whimsical works, which reflect his many sources of inspiration, from the Old Masters to Luciea Freud. Photo by Steve Bromberg.

DIANNA SHOMAKER

Shomaker has been a nurse, a university professor, a researcher, a Dean and an anthropologist, but through it all she has been an artist. She continues to work in her Placitas studio on her signature faceless subjects and innovative ways of abstracting the human figure. In March she opened in a solo show in Scottsdale called "Hands and Feet" with a collection of impressionistic and abstract pieces exploring the body. Working with acrylic, oil, ink and collage, she uses her unique multimedia techniques to create new work interpreting life around us. Photo by Joan Fenicle.

RULAN TANGEN

The year she appeared on our cover, the Director of Dancing Earth: Indigenous Contemporary Dance Creations was asked by Stanford University's Institute of Diversity in the Arts to lead a semester-long project called "Race and Environment." Her choreography previously was commissioned for the films "Apocalypto" directed by Mel Gibson and "The New World," directed by Terence Malick, and by art institutes and dance festivals from Toronto to Santa Fe to Brazil. In the past two years, this award-winning dancer, choreographer and actress has taken Dancing Earth on national tours to showcase their culturally inspired art form. Photo by Peter Ogilvie.

ELISE EBERLE

At the end of a summer internship in NYC with the Fashion Market Editor at Teen Vogue, Eberle landed a supporting role in a feature film by Drake Doremus (Doremus directed "Like Crazy," winner of last year's Sundance Grand Jury Prize). She returned to New Mexico last fall and after the holidays moved to LA, where she's getting into the swing of pilot-season auditions and learning to live in her car like a true Angeleno. Yes, that's Elise on the billboard just north of Bernalillo. Photo by Joan Fenicle.

CARLOS CONTRERAS

Carlos is the proprietor of Immastar Productions - a workshop, performance, visual art, and apparel-creating business that focuses on exposing people of all ages to spoken-word poetry. He continues to create with his compadres in verse, Hakim Bellamy and Colin Diles Hazelbaker, as Urban Verbs. He now freelances on the music beat for ABQ Arts & Entertainment, and blogs at his own site immastar.com. Watch for a variety show in progress that will tour local breweries in efforts to support local businesses while they support local artists, called "I'll Drink to That," Spotlighted in our pull-out section this month. Photo by Barry McCormick.

New book transports, teaches on-location drawing

“The Art of Urban Sketching: Drawing on Location Around the World” was recently released and features 500 sketches from artists throughout the world. With it, you can improve your drawing skills and transport yourself to more than 50 cities from Seattle to Sydney.

This book is a comprehensive guide to on-location drawing. Authored by Gabriel Campanario, founder of the nonprofit group Urban Sketchers and artist for The Seattle Times, the 320-page volume features the work of more than 100 international artists who sketch where they live and travel.

The idea for the book grew out of the Urban Sketchers blog, a website Campanario started in 2008 as a showcase of location sketches submitted by volunteer correspondents around the world.

“I started the Urban Sketchers blog, which later sparked a non-profit organization to promote on-location drawing, because I love to draw my city and see the drawings other people make of their own cities,” said Campanario. “Drawing is a universal language and a formidable communication tool that crosses geographic borders, nationalities and cultures.”

The styles are incredibly varied, ranging from pencil sketches to watercolor paintings. Each artist has a personal style, and each sketch has a story to tell.

“The Art of Urban Sketching” teaches the manifesto behind the growing, global movement: “Show the world, one drawing at a time” and be “truthful to the scenes we witness.” Thanks to the Internet, artists have a network to share, test effects, learn from others and gather feedback.

It also includes profiles of leading artists, the stories behind their drawings, how they work, the tools used, tips and discussions of the benefits working in the urban sketching art form.

The reader can experience as well as participate in urban sketching, with tips about sketching at night or in a moving vehicle. By incorporating urban sketching into daily routine, you’ll end with both a work of art and a journal of your life.
